But the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department, the necessary constitutional means, and personal motives, to resist encroachments of the others.

—JAMES MADISON, FEDERALIST PAPERS #51

It is incumbent upon Congress to be the people's branch, protecting the rights and liberties of the American public while responsibly exercising the authority provided to them in the Constitution.

Today, however, the people's branch finds its constitutional authority regularly challenged. The executive legislates administratively, piling burdensome costs and regulations on the backs of Americans. The judicial branch ignores Congress's written laws and legislates from the bench; and rogue independent agencies operate as a headless fourth branch of government.

If Congress continues to surrender responsibilities to its counterparts, who else will shield the American people from the expanding role of government? Even now, many Americans fear the other branches have seized control over duties specifically entrusted to the legislature.

But, it's not too late to reverse course. As our country grapples with important issues of the day, we must look beyond presidential elections and the courts for answers. The balance of power between the branches must be restored in order for the voices of the people to be heard. It is time for a Congressional Renaissance—one that returns the branch of the people back to its rightful place of authority.
